For almost 20 years, a quiet but ominous fear has haunted the corridors of the Central Intelligence Agency: the specter of a mole—any American official, some where in the upper echelons of the CIA—who is really a Soviet agent planted by its own spy network, the KGB. In the words of a CIA insider, "If there is a mole inside the CIA hierarchy, this means that every particle of our intelligence is suspect and possibly contaminated. It means the Soviets have detailed knowledge of our ventilation capability and can circumvent it, change the world power balance."

Three years ago, a widespread CIA search intensified for a mole who might conceivably be operating his own spy ring within the Agency. This followed a series of arrests of several former CIA employees who admitted having passed intelligence secrets to the Soviets. Many of these secrets concerned clandestine electronic and satellite surveillance systems the U.S. was using to monitor Russian strategic weapons developments. Loss of those secrets was termed by the CIA "the most serious espionage disaster in 20 years."

Then, in late September, CIA officials who were very secrets-disapprobatory, once calm, were in Chesapeake Bay, Body of John Arthur DeQuincy, Director of Strategic Research. At first, the CIA claimed, Paisley, an analyst who didn't solve matters, "was simply working on routine matters with a very limited information disappearance."

The cover-up did unravel. John Paisley retained unlimited access to the Agency's quarters and its information. On the he was working on secret reports on capabilities.

The CIA finally revealed a brilliant Agency continued never been involved in any clandestine intelligence activities and no credible evidence existed to suspect
